

Present and Future. It is said that some of the younger sets are imitating at least one of the examples of their elders. The members of the Coaching Club share and share alike. The young women pay just as much as the young men for their pleasure. The one particular instance among the juniors has filled some of the friends of the party with amazement. Not long ago four juniors, who had always prided themselves on the handsome style in which they treated the girls whom they took out, decided to have a buckboard ride and supper in the country. The juniors each asked one girl to join the party and then one young married couple was invited to play propriety. Everything was as delightful as any reasonable being could desire. The ride was fine and supper finer. When settlement time came each girl found she not only was to be allowed to reimburse the landlady for her own supper, but the supper of her escort as well, and 25 cents apiece besides, to pay for the suppers of the chaperoning couple. It may be that this is the first step toward that perfect independence of women of the future which the broadminded sister-hood of to-day anticipates. If it is, the young women of 1898 will share all the glory which rightfully belongs to pioneers in any great movement, and in years to come the history will be written and the first scene will be laid in Indianapolis.

Common Sense Women. The woman who has to work is coming more and more to the front, and those who are thrown in contact with her are beginping to realize it with a force they would have scarcely thought possible a few years ago. The truth that there are but a minority who hold that labor is degrading is no better understood than right bere in this city, and this fact was strongly commented on by a visitor to one of the leading women. The visitor was constantly being introduced to some one of her own sex, who was engaged in some line of work, for pay. It was unlike her experience in her own home, and she thought it novel. Then she began to notice all the women, who had this faculty to earn, and, finally, she be-came so much interested that her hostess began to think she would have some difficulty in introducing her to all the women she wanted to meet. The women of the city were thoroughly discussed, and none of the talk about them was at all gossipy. One day they went to the Industrial Union and the quantity of salable articles, marked with the makers' names, led her to remark that the women of Indianapolis were more charming and more delightfully independent than any she had ever known or heard of. A young married woman who has traveled extensively says that she knows of no place where money has so little to do with a person's popularity, and where real merit, in whatever guise, is so keenly appreciated. This speaks well for the noble-mindedness of the women of this city. New residents of the place, while they undoubtedly are a trifle surprised at the situation at first, readily adopt the common-sense view and join the ranks.
